

Last spring I attended a small policy workshop that brought together researchers and practitioners from several institutions. The event took place in Vienna and focused on how financial institutions can better coordinate cross-border regulatory reporting.

During one of the discussion sessions I had a long conversation with David Miller, who had recently joined the research group at Global Finance Institute. He explained that their team had been studying how transparency regulations affect smaller banks in Central Europe.

Later in the afternoon we were joined by Elena Kovacs, a visiting fellow who had previously worked on financial governance projects in Budapest. She shared several interesting observations about how different organizations interpret the same regulatory requirements in slightly different ways.

At the end of the workshop, participants agreed that institutions such as Global Finance Institute and other policy research centers could play an important role in bridging the gap between regulators and financial institutions across Europe.
